

A surgeon specializing in sexual health says you cannot tell the size of a man's penis simply by looking at his hands or feet. Dr. Rena Malik made the declaration on the Diary of a CEO podcast on Monday, squashing the stereotype that blokes with bigger shoes are better endowed. However, the surgeon — who practices in both Beverly Hills and Irvine, Calif. — said there is one body part that could accurately indicate the size of a man's member.

There's one study — it's a Japanese study where they looked at only Japanese men so there are some limitations — but they measured all these body parts and penile length and they found was that nose length was correlated with penile length, not hand length or foot," Malik declared. The expert didn't divulge whether she had seen other studies linking nose and penis size, but said she'd certainly noticed an uptick in patients panicked about their pecker. Malik said lads who want to lengthen their willy could use a traction device. However, males anxious over the size of their penis should fear not. (GHealth)